Dear Hiring Manager,

I am not qualified based on your experience requirements, but I am a first to prove myself. I never thought I was good enough or smart enough to be a developer(the anxiety is real). Yet, here I am a month away from graduating from my coding bootcamp and I've understood the material so well I am likely to be working evenings with the school as a teaching assistant after school ends for the next group. How exciting!

I love developing software, it's given me a purpose that I didn't know I could attain. I've been at the same job for almost 7 years now and I haven't felt an ounce of the joy that I've felt since this past September diving into the coding world. The pay in this industry isn't what attracted me, the opportunity to make applications that can nearly automate the convenience of people's lives is the driving passion. What I can accomplish with my mind and my hands has been my life's work. It's why I went from just an Automotive Detailer to being able to do near full restorations and bring people pride back in their lives of the one thing that gets them to where they want and need to be.

I am sure you get these personal emails begging you to give them a chance, but I'm not going to beg. If I am unqualified and/or not what best fits your company's needs at this time, I couldn't agree more and I hope you and I both find what we are looking for. However, if you are willing to throw caution to the wind and take a chance on someone who will give everything they have and won't stop working even after the time card has been punched, then I am that employee. Let me show you what I can be for your company and I will never stop working to elevate and evolve everyone involved.

Thank you so much for your time and please check out my website and resume for an in-depth look into what I am accomplishing and what I am learning. I think you'll find it to be a wide variety suitable for many directions of development.

With deepest sincerity,
Micheal Fitzgerald
